Dept. of Agriculture's Office of Communications : National Drought Policy Commission, 2000 OCLC Number: (OCoLC)540925714 Subject: Drought relief -- Government policy -- United States. Excerpt: . . . Examples of current supply-type triggers used in National drought policy general to define drought or trigger actions must be flexible enough related to potential drought include: precipitation to include a variety of less than 60 of normal for the season or drought situations. It must present water year (used by the National also be specific enough to Weather Services Western Region); precipitation distinguish between those less than 85 of normal over the past six situations that are true months (used by the National Weather Services drought emergencies and Eastern Region); the Palmer Drought Index-2. 0 those that are normal or less; and consolidated drought indices at the cyclical conditions. 20th percentile or less (used by the Drought Monitor). For federal action, more rigid triggers such as 5th percentile drought might be appropriate, reflecting truly unusual circumstances. Examples of demand (impact) based triggers Because of the extremely diverse climates, include water supply less than 60 of normal topographies, watersheds, water sources, and (used by the National Weather Services Western water uses within this country, we find it impractical-Region) and various crop loss thresholds used by the U. S. Department of Agriculture. could act as triggers for drought actions for various parts of the country. However, we recognize that a suite of objective triggers similar to Natural Water Droughts those used by the Australian Drought Policy Review Task Force has the...
