From this fact comes the natural inference that similarity of organism gives rise to similarity in disease and calls for similarity of medicinal treatment. While rapid advance has been made in the care and treatment of man, the animals which serve him, particularly the horse and ox, are still the victims of the cruel and often fatal notion that they require massive doses of drugs. The most skillful veterinary practitioners have demonstrated that the horse does not require much more medicine or much stronger external applications than an adult man, except only when laxatives or anodynes are required. The chief defects in previous veterinary books for the masses have been: (1) Incomplete directions upon how to know what disease the animal is...
