Section 2 outlines a method for studying the development of the lyric. This method is based upon the hypothesis that the lyric persists throughout all cultural levels and that a history of its development should be traced, indeed, from a high plane of culture instead of from a low one, since, on a high cultural plane, the characteristics that define the type can best be determined. But before the connection between the two planes can be made the materials for study in the lower plane must be collected, verified, and analyzed, approximately in the way the materials of the higher cultural levels have been studied. Part II is a body of texts consisting of songs of the Bushmen, the Ekoi, the Torres Straits natives, the Veddas, the Zulus, the Baganda, the Masai, the Nandi, the Chippewa, and the Teton-Sioux. Part III,...
